The notion of web assembly was born from startups like Elgo . As technology leaders, we loved the ideas that could be achieved by bringing it into the web, so we started working with the browser builders and created a standard to allow us to significantly reduce the web page's size by implementing code in the browser itself. This opens up the opportunity to showcase the power of CSS and JavaScript by applying a variety of new web assembly features, including `current-point`. They create a composite of several layers and make it easier to see how the image will look if you make changes. Very useful! The Windows team has been working on getting WebAssembly on Windows for a while now. That makes sense - WebAssembly is what is used by Chrome. So when testing some things, I needed to use Edge. Instead of downloading and launching Edge for a test, and then assigning it a shortcut, I just launched the shell script I wrote to open an Edge instance that used WebAssembly. And when testing WebAssembly scripts, we made a few changes to Edge that let us inline the scripts so they run in the browser without downloading anything or waiting for the script to finish. The end result is now the Edge browser can handle WebAssembly in ways that were only possible before when using the EdgeHTML platform. e3d0a04c9c
