Effects of different dietary salt and phosphorus intake on mineral metabolism in normal and hypertensive New Zealand white rabbits. The effects of long-term high and low dietary salt intake with and without added phosphorus on serum sodium, potassium, phosphate, calcium, magnesium and on blood pressure were studied in normal and hypertensive New Zealand white rabbits aged 2, 4, 8, 16 and 24 weeks. Mean blood pressures (BP) in the untreated animals rose from 8 to 24 weeks with the addition of 1% or 2% phosphorus in the diet, but were not significantly affected in the presence of 1% salt. In the presence of 2% phosphorus and either 1% or 2% salt, BP rose significantly with age. The BP rose non-linearly with increasing dietary phosphorus content, irrespective of salt intake, in both normal and hypertensive animals. The hypertensive animals had greater serum sodium, phosphate and calcium concentrations than normal animals. Sodium intake significantly decreased serum sodium levels, but had no effect on BP. Phosphate intake significantly increased serum phosphate, calcium and magnesium concentrations, and blood pressure, but had little effect on magnesium levels in either normal or hypertensive animals. The data suggest that phosphorus, at normal and abnormal phosphorus intake, increases serum phosphate, calcium and magnesium
